I was named the 'Business person of the year' by the Daily Telegraph, in their Great Britons of 2008 awards on 30th December 2008. Citation said

"Not only did David Blanchflower foresee the scale of the recession months before the eventual impact, he attempted to do something about it. He was the one Bank of England executive who consistently argued in favour of dramatically lower interest rates. He was the first policy-maker from the Bank, Treasury or Financial Services Authority to warn that the UK faced recession and the possibility of house prices falling by a third. Blanchflower has decided against taking up a second three-year term on the MPC; the Bank of England will be the weaker for his absence."

A lead editorial in the Guardian newspaper Wednesday 25 March 2009 commented on my contribution at the Bank of England.

Editorial: In praise of ... David Blanchflower

"Even if he had not become the Bank of England's biggest dissenter - the Threadneedle One - David Blanchflower would still have been a remarkable economist. His academic interests lie in jobs and wages and happiness - stuff that actually matters to lay people, but which researchers usually ignore, to spend more time with their dynamic stochastic general equilibrium models. He can translate findings into non-academic language, as befits someone who last year described his research technique to this paper as "the economics of walking about: you ask people what's going on in their lives and you take seriously what answers they give you". His stint on the Bank's monetary policy committee brought Professor Blanchflower into the public eye. He was the first on the MPC to spot the seriousness of the credit crunch, and for a long time the only one to advocate cutting rates in response. The Bank may be operationally independent, but outspokenness is not necessarily prized in its staff. The professor was much ridiculed, yet kept on standing out until everyone else caught up. The course of this crisis would have been very different had others shown such intellectual courage. Professor Blanchflower was at it again last night, with a speech that criticised as "utopian" the typical assumptions of central bankers that markets are perfect and people always rational. That combination of intellectual pedigree and plain common sense will be much missed when he steps down from the MPC this spring."
