PUBLICATIONS

Books:

Unlikely Collaboration: Gertrude Stein, Bernard Faÿ, and the Vichy Dilemma (New York: Columbia University Press, 2011).

A study of the friendship between Gertrude Stein and Bernard Faÿ, director of the Bibliothèque Nationale under the collaborationist Vichy government and chief protector of Stein’s interests in France during World War II. From the late 1920s-40s Stein and Faÿ shared a worldview marked by aesthetic radicalism and political conservatism, culminating in Stein’s agreement in 1941, at the suggestion of Faÿ, to translate the speeches of Marshal Philippe Pétain into English. I read the Stein-Faÿ relationship as a case study through which to raise larger theoretical questions: about the role of prominent intellectuals in wartime France; about the place of America in the Vichy imagination; about the libidinal promise or threat of fascist ideology for sexual identity; and most importantly, about the intersection of modernism and fascism.

Gertrude Stein, Modernism, and the Problem of “Genius” (Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2000).

excerpt from ch. 1 reprinted as “Race and Jewishness” in Three Lives and Q.E.D., ed. Marianne DeKoven (New York: Norton, 2005): 503-13.

An analysis of Gertrude Stein’s claims to “genius” in the light of her competing claims to being representative of “everybody.” Situating Stein in the context of larger tensions within European and American high modernism circulating around aesthetic autonomy and its relation to gender, sexuality, class, race, and nation/expatriation, I show how the notion of “genius” for Stein and her modernist contemporaries generates multiple and often contradictory authorial affiliations.
