Center for the Study of the Presidency

Steve Zyck '04 and Adil Ahmad '05 will complete a year long program by presenting original papers at the April annual conference of the Center for the Study of the Presidency in Washington, DC. A Women and Gender Studies major, Zyck (pictured left) will address the role that masculinity plays in the public's perception of the presidency. Math major Ahmad will speak about the role of the presidency and its interaction with insurgency movements around the globe.

Selected as CSP Fellows for 2003-2004, they spent time in the Capitol this year studying the U.S. Presidency, the public policymaking process, and the President's relations with Congress, the media, and the American public. They interacted with scholars, policy experts, and top officials in the White House and attended think tank briefings, press conferences, educational seminars, and leadership conferences.

Student Initiatives Endowment Established

In memory of their father, Kristen '89, Alexander III '91 and Hollis '00 established The Alexander C. von Summer Class of 1960 Student Initiative Fund at the Rockefeller Center. Income from the endowment will support activities that promote "individual initiative and understanding of democratic principles based on free markets and personal responsibility."

Many Faces of Leadership

Creating new initiatives, leading organizations, and participating in leadership training programs are some of the ways Rockefeller encourages students like those pictured below to think critically about the nature of leadership. These opportunities build a foundation of skills and perspectives that will help them meet challenges they'll face in their work and communities.

ROCKEFELLER LAUNCHES PUBLIC IMPACT INITIATIVE PILOT PROGRAMS

The Center is ready to launch the first phase of its programs in connection with the new campus-wide Public Impact Initiative. It's exciting to do this concurrently with Rockefeller's 20th Anniversary and its year-long program theme, "Civic Responsibility: Personal Action—Public Impact."

Concern about low participation in politics among young people nation-wide and a particular need on campus to make the range of options for public service more accessible to students were the catalysts that brought representatives from the Rockefeller Center, Tucker Foundation, Tuck School, Dickey Center, Ethics Institute, Career Services and Dean of Students Office together in 2002. The question we all wanted to answer was how we could better help eager Dartmouth students, who want to make a difference, translate their undergraduate experiences into real-world action in their communities and professions.

Students helped clarify the goals of the Initiative at a summer retreat, and subsequent meetings with Provost Barry Scherr generated an agenda of programs that could attract outside funding. Rockefeller turned its attention to generating proposals for its key programs. Through the generosity of several foundations (see box) and the Friends of Rockefeller Center annual appeal, the Center is gearing up to launch three pilot projects: the Undergraduate Public Policy Research Shop, the Civic Skills Training Workshop and the Practitioner in Residence program.

Undergraduate Public Policy Research Shop

The research shop, modeled after the Congressional Research Service in Washington, will provide timely background information to New Hampshire and Vermont state lawmakers on policy issues pertaining to the environment, health and education. Paid interns will conduct background research on these issues in the fall term; and, in the winter and spring terms—when the legislatures are actually in session—will prepare memos responding to legislators' requests. Students will summarize findings from academic and think tank research, compile best practices and model legislation from around the country, and examine problems and their solutions in other states.

Civic Skills Training Workshop

An intensive training session will be held in September for students interested in active participation within their communities. In addition to developing networking, communication and conflict resolution skills, students will learn about grassroots and political mobilization, polling, lobbying, media strategies, volunteer coordination, campaign finance, strategic planning and fundraising.

Practitioners in Residence

Building on its successful public lecture program, the Center will bring individuals with significant professional experience in public service, politics or public policy to campus for extended stays. While details are still being firmed up, the first practitioner in residence will be Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist and author Ron Suskind.

Through these programs, students will: 1) have a direct impact on important public policy questions, 2) learn how the political process works,

3) engage experienced policy makers and practitioners in discussion and 4) develop concrete skills to strengthen their ability to actively participate in their communities and pursue careers in the common good.

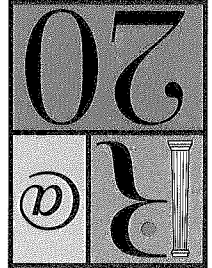

Fall term Research Shop interns and Civic Skills Training participants will be selected in spring 2004.
